

J. LEONARD SHEETS is a chap who figures things out... Sheets used to be a strong competitor in chess championships here. He'd study for hours to solve problems developed on the board, and as a result was hard to beat.

Now he's a golfer, playing at Jefferson Park.

Instead of just banging practice balls when he practices, Sheets has developed a system that might be interesting to other club swingers. He numbers his practice balls.

When he starts out to warm up, he hits three balls with a No. 9 iron, three more with No. 8, three with No. 7, etc.

So when Sheets thinks he has overpowered a ball, he can tell the distance by checking the number of the pellet he clouted.

Much better than just identifying a practice ball with blue or yellow paint smears.

P. S.—Golfer Sheets reports the practice pasture back of the Jefferson clubhouse is becoming over-crowded. "My numbered balls perhaps should remind some of the golfers to give up the game and try a game or two of pool, just for diversion."
